DESCRIPTION:

111 West Clement Street is a two story brick rowhouse located on the south side of Clement Street between, Clarkson and Hanover Streets, one block south of the Sharp-Leadenhall Planning District of south central Baltimore, Maryland. The first floor is two bays wide with a large round arched window with a marble sill. The original window has been replaced with a 6 over 6 window and the transom filled in. The door is also under a round arch. The original door has been replaced and the fanlight filled in. The second floor is three bays wide. The original 1 over 1 windows are still intact with wood sills, segmental brick arches, and scroll sawed tympanums. The building has a molded wood cornice with decorative brackets and a running board. The cornice at 109 Clement differs from 111, but the cornice at 111 is the same as that of 113. 111 West Clement Street has marble steps and a marble raised basement.

SIGNIFICANCE:

AREA:Architecture LEVEL:Local

111 West Clement Street would be considered eligible for the National Register within a district of undetermined boundaries in south central Baltimore in the vicinity of the Sharp-Leadenhall Planning District. It is an example of the dominant building type in Baltimore, the rowhouse, which has been continually utilized by Baltimoreans of all classes. Sharp-Leadenhall is a name that was applied in the 1970s to a neighborhood in south central Baltimore that developed during the last half of the nineteenth century. The neighborhood has always had a working class population, serving as home to the people who made their living in port or railroad related jobs. Sharp-Leadenhall is located near the harbor and Camden Station. Sharp-Leadenhall is also one of the city's first neighborhoods originally homesteaded by blacks. As immigration increased at the end of the nineteenth century Irish and German immigrants also settled in the area. In 1869, at the time of the Sachse Bird's Eye View, the land encompassing this block of Clement Street was undeveloped. The Bromley Atlas shows that not only by 1896 had development spread south past Clement Street, but also that there were a large number of manufacturers and factories, as well as the Consolidated Gas Company, located in the area supplying a livelihood for the residents.
